Belgians Stephane Aubier and Vincent Patar created this zany film in 2009. Is it worth watching?

Well to be honest, I haven't seen it. But I have received a lot of e-mails about it over the past few years by fans of the feature. Yes I said feature! And it's made with very simple characters and sets, purposely made to be a little grungy. In fact, they wanted to use simple worn out and used toys as the basis for their feature.

The duo didn't just make a feature that became an over-night success. They made several short films based around the same characters, an indian, cowboy and a horse which first became popular on TV. They also used their underground connections in the comic world and previous 2-D cel animation experience to draw upon. The end result is one downhill gag after another after one of the main characters accidentally buys fifty million bricks and a BBQ backfires. How can that happen? I don't know myself as I haven't seen the full film. But I have seen the trailers, one of which you can watch below.

{youtube}9l-Cp5EAg1E{/youtube}

Read more about the film makers, the main characters and read an interview with them on the official site here
.

If you're interested in supporting both Stephane and Vincent in their stop motion efforts, you can get a copy of the film here .